NUMBERING SYSTEM—HOW TO USE THIS GUIDE

1920

How to use this Guide is explained at the side of map of the city.

Numbers run 100 to the block north and south from Washington, east and west from Meridian. A stranger should familiarize himself first with the map of the mile square. Even numbers are on the north and west sides of streets, odd numbers on east and south sides. Certain north and south, and east and west streets are called avenues, such as Capitol, College, Central, Senate, Columbia, Hamilton, Churchman and Martindale. Indianapolis people are nearly always courteous in answering the questions of strangers.

SOME FEATURES OF INDIANAPOLIS

The capital and geographical center of Indiana, Indianapolis is nearest the center of population of all large cities of the United States. The population of 233,650 of 1910 has grown to 314,194. Covering 42 square miles, the elevation above sea is from 712 to 832 feet.

Its traction and steam railway facilities, including its four-track steam belt railway, give it unsurpassed transportation advantages. Eight million passengers passed through the Traction Terminal Station in 1919, an average of 21,912 daily. The Union steam railway station has been remodeled and the great work of track elevation is proceeding.

The LaFayette Motors Company has arranged to build many new houses for employes at the industrial suburb, Mars Hill. The Prest-o-Lite Company has begun a like work at the World's Greatest Speedway.

Beech Grove, the industrial suburb which has grown up around the shops of the Big Four railway system, southeast of the city proper, continues to grow.

Ft. Benjamin Harrison, twelve miles northeast of the city, on the Indiana Union Traction, was the center of exceptional interest during the World War.

Indianapolis is the second city of the United States in manufacture of automobiles and automobile accessories. It is the headquarters of many national, particularly labor, organizations.

The Federal Building cost $2,000,000. The Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument is 284½ feet high.
